

Charity and Humanitarian Aid

Part 2

An Act of Charity As an Act of Sacrifice

Money is the result of investing time from your life - at work. In other words, a person exchanges a portion of his life - for money. And there are even people who risk their lives - for their salary. Therefore, the person who gives charity actually gives a part of his life for the poor, a part of his soul - "a piece of soul" for the poor.

Now, make your calculation, how much money are you willing to "sell" an hour of your life for? Concerning charity: on which alter do you sacrifice a "tithe of your life"? Do you acquire a life - in exchange for your life? In other words - a life for a life?

If you dwell on this question deeply, certainly you choose to invest your life for a (better and holy) life. But is your investment secure, generating and producing life for you? Is your contribution of a "coin of life" generating a return of a "coin of life" for you? In other words; a "coin in exchange for a coin?" Or does each "coin" generate two, three, ten or even a thousand "coins of life?"
